- Document A-

William Martin Murphy, quoted in the Irish Times, 17 November, 1913

The claim, as I understand it now, of those who speak for trade unionism is that, while the union leaders are entitled to attack an employer and destroy his business whenever and however they like, an employer commits a high crime and misdemeanour if he takes any measures to defend himself.

The action of Mr. Larkin in attacking the Tramway Company was not due to the fact that the men were underpaid, nor was it due to the slums of Dublin, which are supposed to be the root of all discontent.

These men are well paid, and they live mainly outside the slum areas in the suburbs of the city, many of them in houses at cheap rents provided for them by the company, close by the car depots, where their day's work begins and ends.

The sole reason for this audacious attempt to paralyse the tramway traffic in the busiest week of the year, was the colossal vanity and vaulting ambition of Mr. Larkin, who thought to make himself the unquestioned labour dictator of the city.
